

Hi,

It's a slightly strange thing, applying to a Melbourne company from a flat in Malmö and realising that Thule Group, which now owns one of my favourite brands, sits just a few minutes up the road from me. The mount I would choose for my own bike turns out to be yours, and it's hiring for a role that feels remarkably close to the one I would build for myself.

I'm the kind of person your content is made for. I mountain bike, climb, spend as much time outdoors as I can, and I've collected my fair share of injuries along the way. I also spent four years above the Arctic Circle making films about people who cycle through polar winters. When the job description talks about gravel riding, overlanding, cycling and the communities around them, that's not a category I would need to learn. It's already part of my life.

What I bring is a combination that's hard to find. I build brands from the ground up, defining identity, voice and creative direction, and I also understand the craft behind the work itself. Over the years I've led designers, developers, filmmakers, writers and external partners across multiple countries, and I've found that creative leadership is strongest when you understand the challenges your team is working through firsthand. When I built and launched a cold brew brand across eight countries, I coordinated internal and external teams across five countries to bring the brand from concept to shelf. Alongside that, I've directed productions ranging from Business Insider documentaries with more than eight million views to international documentary series produced across Europe.

Across every project, my focus has been the same: building brands that feel coherent wherever people encounter them. Whether it's a documentary, a product launch or a social campaign, I make sure the brand's voice, visual identity and storytelling stay consistent across every channel and touchpoint. That's the part of your role that resonates most with me.

Cara Siepenkort at Thule recommended both Quad Lock and this role, and spoke highly of the team and culture. Some of my work has also been featured by Thule, which makes the connection feel even more meaningful.

I've always been drawn to fast growing companies where people are encouraged to build, experiment and take ownership. Having built my own brands and businesses, that entrepreneurial environment is where I do my best work.

I've wanted to live in Australia for as long as I can remember. This is the first opportunity where the move is driven not just by the destination, but by a role I would genuinely be excited to take on.

I would welcome the opportunity to speak with you and the team, and to discuss how my experience could help shape the next chapter of the Quad Lock brand.

Kind regards,

Paul Frost
+46764510037
paul@roamer.se

paulfrost